Employers are not alone among classes of defendants who might incur strict liability deriving from the negligent, or sometimes criminal, conduct of others. Strict liability might be imposed on schools, hospitals, principal of agent, owner or bailee of car, and ship owner.

Geoffrey Hancy, senior barrister of independent chambers, will talk about relationships that give rise to and the collection of principles that we call 'vicarious liability', and about the related notion of non-delegable duty. Is there a unifying theme? What are the limitations on or potential for expansion of categories of defendants?
